

Working for profit...isn't inherently wrong. Working to benefit oneself isn't necessarily a manifestation of greed. It can represent, and usually does, accepting the mantle of responsibility, acting so as not to have to rely on society or other individuals for basic needs...[Moreover, t]he beauty of a free enterprise economy is that when the worker, the supervisor, the manager, the entrepreneur, and the CEO voluntarily do their jobs well, they're not the only ones who benefit. Others —people who use their company's services and/or products—benefit as well. None of this activity is disruptive, nor is any of it forced. And all of it contributes to order, stability, and progress in society.